The first concert of the Kneisel Quartet for the present season took place last evening in Acolian Hall. The programme comprised Max Reger's quartet in E flat, opus 109; Heethoven's D major quartet, opus 18, No. 3, and Cesar Franck's quintet in F minor for plano nd strings. The planist was Mme. Olga

Max Reger has lately passed to the majority and his loss is deplored in Germany. Without doubt he was a brilliant representative of efficiency in music. He excelled in that kind of composition

He excelled in that kind of composition which by taking thought endeavors to and cubits to its artistic stature. But rarely does one discern in his productions the burning force of imagination or the breathing of that tenderness which carries music to the heart.

Occasionally Reger exhibits humor of a certain kind. Perhaps it is the variety of humor familiar among scientific men, who make mathematical jests in their moments of leisure and play tricks upon one another with such merry trifies as coefficients and transposed signs. But a certain stinging humor there is in some of Reger's works, and there is in some of Reger's works, and sometimes even a rustic joliity. But on the whole his compositions impress the barbarlan of the non-Teutonic world as made music.

The quariet performed last evening asks for a deal of hard listening. One must approach it with devotion, if not with determination. He can thus perhaps interest himself in its close and ingenious workmanship and in its acrid harmonic developments, which the irreverent might pronounce merely ugly. The Kneisel Quartet certainly brought devotion to the performance and succeeded in extracting from the composition all the juice that was in it. But nade music.

tion all the juice that was in it. But still it persisted in being dry.

The audience unquestionably enjoyed the Beethoven quartet much more and with good reason, for here are spontaneous melody and beauty. The Cesar Franck quintet is no stranger to local concert rooms and it is welcome at all times. For while Kranck was a proconcert rooms and it is welcome at an times. For while Franck was a profound thinker, he sometimes saw visions which shone resplendent. The quintet was well played, Mme. Samaroff bringing to the piano part vigor and a wide range of dynamics, albeit at times somewhat too forcible in her attacks. But what too forcible in her attacks. But on the whole she played with much sym-pathy and with style.
